How is the Norwegian ODA budget structured?

Most ODA is managed by the MFA, which allocates the majority of its funding to a 'global schemes' portfolio targeted at addressing various thematic priorities

According to the 2018 budget, ODA is set to stand at NOK35.1 billion (US$4.2 billion) in 2018, a NOK1.3 billion increase from 2017 (around US$150 million). ODA comes from two main sources: the Ministry of Foreign Affairs (MFA) and the Ministry of Climate and Environment.

The MFA provides 91% (NOK32.0 billion, or US$3.8 billion) of the ODA budget. The MFA's budget for development assistance is divided into four major envelopes: 1) administrative costs, 2) bilateral spending, 3) 'global schemes', and 4) multilateral spending.

The 'bilateral spending' envelope is composed of budget lines for regions (Africa, Asia, Middle East and North Africa, and Latin America). The 'multilateral spending' envelope is divided into budget lines for funding for UN agencies and multilateral financial institutions. In 2018, 85% of Norway's funding to the Asian Infrastructure Investment Bank (AIIB; NOK162 million or US$19 million) is counted as ODA. It is disbursed by the MFA but sits outside of the four main envelopes listed above.

The 'global schemes' envelope receives by far the largest funding by the MFA, amounting to 57% of all Norway's ODA expenditure in 2018: it combines bilateral and multilateral funding for thematic priorities. There are currently 10 global schemes in Norway's ODA budget : 1) global health and education; 2) emergency aid, humanitarian aid and human rights; 3) civil society and democracy; 4) business development; 5) peace, reconciliation and democracy; 6) climate, environment, and renewable energy; 7) costs of hosting refugees in Norway; 8) research, capacity-building and evaluation; 9) transitional assistance; and 10) women's rights and gender equality. The largest envelopes correspond to the government priorities (see table).

In addition, the Ministry of Climate and Environment provides NOK3.0 billion (US$351 million) in ODA, mainly for Norway's International Climate and Forest Initiative (NICFI). The initiative aims to slow, halt, and eventually reduce greenhouse-gas emissions from deforestation and forest degradation in partner countries.
