Who are the main actors in Australia's development cooperation?

DFAT manages almost all of Australia's overseas development programs

Australia's Prime Minister, Scott Morrison, leads overall policy decision-making. He has served as Prime Minister and Leader of the conservative Liberal Party since August 2018, following an internal leadership shuffle which saw him replace Malcolm Turnbull. In July 2016, Turnbull led the Liberal Party to narrowly secure enough seats to form a new Liberal National Coalition majority government. The next federal election is due between August 2018 and November 2019.

The Department of Foreign Affairs and Trade (DFAT) manages development policy and the development budget and delivers almost all Australia's overseas programs. Former prime minister Tony Abbott integrated the Australian Agency for International Development (AusAID), the previous implementing agency, into DFAT in 2013. The justification for the merger was that it would help deliver a more responsive and flexible development program, better aligned with Australia's national interests. Emulating the approach of conservative governments in Canada and New Zealand, the government under Prime Minister Abbott sought to save considerable administrative costs: DFAT cut 500 jobs by the end of FY2015-16.

The Minister for Foreign Affairs, Marise Payne, is responsible for directing Australia's development program. She is traditionally a strong parliamentary supporter of human rights and action on HIV/AIDS. The Assistant Minister for International Development and the Pacific, Anne Ruston, works under Payne to strengthen Australia's relationships with the Pacific Islands. Launched by Turnbull in 2015 as ministerial-level position, the position was downgraded to assistant minister following the government's internal leadership shuffle in August 2018.

Within DFAT, the deputy secretary for Global Cooperation, Development and Partnerships oversees four development divisions. These include the Multilateral Development and Finance Division, which manages contributions to multilateral organizations, and the Multilateral Policy Division, which includes the Gender Equality Branch. DFAT's innovation hub, known as 'innovationXchange', is hosted at DFAT but guided by a 14-member International Reference Group.

About 93% of the development program is managed by DFAT under Australia's 'whole of government approach'; the department cooperates with other government agencies, which deliver the remaining 7% of ODA.

Australia's parliament is responsible for debating and formally reviewing the final federal budget between May and June each year and passing it into law before the end of June, the end of the fiscal year. In practice, the budget, including the development budget component, is usually passed without amendments by the government majority in the House of Representatives. In the Senate, the proposed ODA budget is reviewed by the Foreign Affairs, Defense and Trade Legislation Committee. This committee can seek information on the proposed development program but has no power to amend the budget.

The government funds civil society organizations (CSOs) with A$183 million (US$136 million) under the umbrella of its 'Global Programs' component. In addition, Australian CSOs mobilize public support and voluntary contributions for development. In 2014, members of the Australian association for development NGOs, the Australian Council for International Development (ACFID), raised A$921 million (US$685 million) from the Australian community for development and humanitarian work. More than 140 Australian non-government organizations (NGOs) operate under ACFID's self-regulatory and highly regarded Code of Conduct, which defines standards of good development practice for its members. ACFID also supports policy engagement with the Australian government, as the primary entry point for collaboration and collective action by development NGOs in Australia. Over fifty Australian NGOs have met comprehensive due-diligence requirements through accreditation under DFAT's Australian NGO Cooperation Program. Accredited Australian NGOs are partners who have demonstrated their community support and their organizational capacity to deliver results, which enables them to receive funding from the government.
